

Working Together: The Evolving Issues between Minorities and Law Enforcement

Michael E Cochran

Lack of minority involvement in the judicial system has long been a deterrent to effective law enforcement, specifically in minority neighborhoods. This study identifies the various possible causes for this traditional lack of minority involvement, and identifies some innovative ways to break the communication barriers between members of the African American society and law enforcement. By working together and learning the roles of the community and those of law enforcement, both law enforcement and the minority community can begin to forge a working partnership.
